WHAT WE THINK

on the month's news

Facing two ways at once

Within the space of a mere three days last month the Major Government achieved the feat of appearing progressively committed towards further European integration and at the same time resolute in its defence of British national freedom and sovereignty.

In a speech at the Lord Mayor's Banquet at London's Guildhall on the evening of November 11th, Prime Minister John made what must have been, to the assembled company of bankers, financiers and other luminaries of the City establishment, a highly satisfying declaration of his belief that Britain's destiny lay in Europe. Utilising the customary sporty jargon beloved of the Euro-integrationists, he said of the moves towards closer union: "To hold back now would leave us in the Continent's second division." Continued Mr. Major: "We would be isolated from the rising living standards that an integrated financial and economic system would generate for our 11 EC partners."

Then, as if sensing that a few crumbs had to be offered to those nervous about increasing immersion in Europe, he went on to say that the crunch point would come for a decision on economic union, and asserted that:-

"When that moment comes we shall need to weigh carefully the issues raised by a single currency on sovereignty and accountability against the potential impact on our influence and prosperity were we to take a different decision from our principal competitors."

Here, to understand exactly what Mr. Major was getting at, we need to be acquainted with the language of double-speak habitual to those who move in the world of modern power-politics. When our Premier spoke of weighing...against..., what he really meant was the need for him and his confederates to weigh the imperative (to them) of integrating the British economic and monetary system with that of Europe against the possible backlash that this might provoke among back-benchers of his own party and among the British public as a whole. If we needed any confirmation that this was what was in the Prime Minister's mind, he supplied in his next statement, in which he said:-

"It would be wrong to decide now to join a single currency. But it would be equally wrong to decide now that under no circumstances will we ever do so. I believe the basis of an agreement can be found, but it has to be an agreement all 12 nations can accept. That will take give and take on all sides."

Translation: For us to join a single currency now would be unacceptable to the British people and even to a not insubstantial section within Tory Party politics. But it would be wrong to decide now that those within the country opposed to this could not be brought round to accepting it with a bit more brainwashing carried out by means of high-pressure propaganda. The basis of an agreement can be found, but it has to be an agreement presented in such a manner, and in such a climate, that the nation will be so stupefied that it will not realise what is happening until the noose has been tightened around its neck!

As if to underline the reality of the road along which Mr. Major and his Government are heading, the very next day Britain, in the person of Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd, made a further significant concession of sovereignty to Europe by agreeing to the rule that the European Parliament may veto decisions made by EC member governments. This was neatly described by the Daily Mail thus: "...John Major has played his biggest compromise card in the poker game over European union...He calculates that by accepting a veto in principle he has more chance of severely restricting the areas where it can be used."

The real 'poker game' to which this report refers is of course that being played with those elements in Britain who are averse to further concessions to Europe. As for the 'compromise card', has not the whole process of integration into Europe over the past 30 years or so been accomplished by the playing of a series of 'compromise cards'? First, a policy aim is postulated which is known to be currently unacceptable to the majority of people in the United Kingdom. Next, we witness the ritual of parliamentary opposition to that aim — leaving the public thus reassured that at least some of its elected representatives speak up on its behalf. Finally, a policy is decided upon which constitutes a halfway point between the original proposal and the consensus opposed to it. Thesis — antithesis — synthesis, as Hegel would have put it. Good old British compromise has triumphed: extreme positions have been abandoned and reason and moderation have carried the day. In the meantime the integration of Britain into European union has proceeded just a few more notches — and so on to the next round...

The very day after the announcement of the veto concession, a further announcement was made — this time obviously couched with the purpose of appeasing anti-integrationist opinion in Britain. Mr. Hurd was reported as having issued "a blunt warning" to Europe's federalists. His Government, he said, would never accept federation — meaning of course, as the Daily Mail put it, "Britain's unbending determination to erase the word 'federal' from any treaty signed next month" (i.e. at this month's Maastricht conference).

Most probably, Britain will succeed in getting agreement to omit the dreaded 'f-word', as it has been coined, from any written European treaty — no doubt after a dramatically staged argument with those who, like the Dutch, want to see it included. This will then be presented to the public in this country as an affirmation that British national sovereignty will not be surrendered. In fact, all that will have occurred will be an exercise in semantics. What matters to the Euro-integrationists is not what words are used to describe their schemes but the substance that lies behind the words. 'Federation', when seen from this point of view, can be regarded as quite expendable — indeed valuable precisely on account of its expendability. Who cares — if all, or nearly all, of the practical elements of federation are, bit by bit, being accomplished? Thus we can look forward to a big battle over the 'f-word', which the British Government will win, concealing the much more significant battle concerning the transfer of actual power to Europe, which the British Government (not unwillingly) will lose!

By such camouflages and artifices does the business proceed. Here it is pertinent to recall the words used in this column in July of this year, which we feel perfectly sum up what is happening on the European front:-

"So to clarify matters we might begin by presenting the situation in simplified form. This is that for more than 30 years those who dominate the most powerful institutions in our country — most of all parliament, government and the mass media — have been committed to railroading Britain into a European union in which she will progressively lose all the vital instruments of national freedom and sovereignty. This European union is in its turn conceived as no more than a halfway stage towards an eventual world union, presided over by a single world government, under which no distinct nations or races... will be permitted to exist. That is the name of the game. That is what has been the dominant motif of all orthodox politics during the past three or four decades, at both national and international level.

"The one overriding problem encountered by those who have been pursuing this policy is that the policy runs contrary to the deepest instincts of the majority of people within the nations involved — and this is particularly the case with the people of the United Kingdom.

"It has therefore been deemed necessary, all along the way, to avoid confronting the people with an honest presentation of the full facts and the full objectives of the policy. To this purpose, a series of weapons and tactics have been employed, which have included confusion, obfuscation, circumlocution, euphemism, soporifics and double-speak..."

And to summarise what Mr. Major and his Government are now saying and doing, we could not possibly do better than quote the words, not of an anti-European, but of one of the most ardent of pro-Europeans in British politics today: Mr. Paddy Ashdown of the Liberal Democrats, who does not object to the Government's policies but simply wants it to come clean with the people over what those policies are. Mr. Ashdown said of the Prime Minister, as we also quoted in our July commentary:-

"One minute he is making pro-European speeches. The next minute, his Government is once again isolated in European negotiations. One day we are told that Mr. Major has ditched Mrs. Thatcher's anti-European views. The next day, ministers claim that there is no difference between them..."

"Mr. Major tells us that we must trust him. He sets no course, he follows no map, but he will tell us of the destination when we get there."

Disagreeing as we do with almost everything Mr. Ashdown normally says, we have to say that in this case we couldn't have put it better!

Once the basic policy aim over Europe is understood, and once we understand the manoeuvres in which the politicians committed to that policy aim are forced to engage in order to navigate the tricky course towards it, with all the minefields along the route in the way of grass-roots resistance in the country, we can see present 'negotiations' with Europe for what they are: they are essentially postures designed for consumption at home; they have no substance in reality, and thus the arguments raging over them are merely flimsy pretences, staged to confuse and deceive. The Prime Minister sets no course, says Mr. Ashdown. What the Liberal Democrat leader means is that the Prime Minister sets no course in terms of public avowal. The actual course has been set a long time ago, and Mr. Major would have never got within a hundred miles of the Tory leadership and premiership had it not been known that he would be a faithful follower of that course and a committed servant of the policy from which it stems. The only issue still to be decided is how the voting cattle constituting the British public are going to be corralled into the pen that their masters have designed for them. This is what the present European postures, acrobatics and contradictions are all about.

Nothing is going to stop the immersion of Britain into a full-scale European union because that policy has been irrevocably decided upon by those who wield the power, and no force presently exists on the domestic political scene that can or will resist the process. What matters — and it is all that matters — is whether in the next decade a new force emerges in British politics which does possess the desire and will to reverse this policy and the necessary means to make its will effective. It will mean, not stopping full-scale British integration into Europe — for that integration will already have taken place, but putting it into reverse by bringing Britain out of European union and restoring British independence. This is the issue at stake, and it is the only issue that matters. All else, where the European question is concerned, is trivia.

Identical spoof on immigration

The tactics used by the Government to cajole Britain into European union are being duplicated exactly in the field of immigration, where the policy objective — also decided a long time ago — is to turn the country into a multi-racial Babylon. Here again we have an aim which runs contrary to the deepest instincts and sentiments of the majority of British people, so here again deception must be employed on a grand scale, with a pretence being maintained that the powers-that-be are standing firm in their protection of the national frontiers against the alien flood, whereas in reality the flood is continuing almost unabated — the fact of it being masked by a few highly publicised token gestures designed to give the opposite impression.

MISLEADING HEADLINE
This was the front-page of the Daily Mail on November 5th. The big print masked the reality that Britain is all the time surrendering to the immigrant flood that menaces her borders.

Emblazoned across the front page of the Daily Mail on November 5th was the headline: "No surrender on migrants." Following was a report which immediately made it clear that the headline was somewhat of a misleading one. It dealt with a declaration which Foreign Secretary Hurd had made to a meeting of his counterparts in Europe to the effect that our Government was not prepared to tolerate any tampering by Europe with Britain's system of immigration controls. At this point many a reader might have been prompted to ask: what immigration controls? To that matter we will return in a moment. The report went on to say that Mr. Hurd's speech "staked out a tough British position in advance of next month's Maastricht summit on greater political and economic unity." Germany, so it continued, had wanted immigration policy 'harmonised' for free movement throughout the 12 EC states, but our Foreign Secretary had retorted that "the Community cannot harmonise history," and that "Britain faces specific problems from the Indian sub-continent. Many people from there, now living in Britain, seek spouses from the sub-continent. We therefore have rigorous procedures to work out whether the primary purpose of people coming in is to marry or to enter Britain."

He continued: "What would happen if 'harmonisation' opened the way to travel without visas for non-EC citizens between countries like Luxembourg and Britain? Britain had more than a hundred immigration officials stationed in India, Bangladesh and Pakistan to check that visa applications were genuine. Could Luxembourg mount a similar effort?"

All of this, of course, sounds like fighting talk. Accompanied by such adjectives as 'tough' and preceded by a headline which speaks of 'no surrender', it might give to the bemused member of the British public the impression that we have a government that is not only determined not to be bossed around by the EC bureaucrats but is equally determined to prevent this country being flooded by an immigrant tide. Rule Britannia — trust John Major!

In just the same way, the Major Government has in recent weeks maintained an entirely bogus posture concerning its purported 'determination' not to let Britain be overwhelmed by immigrants claiming to be refugees from Third World countries in which they have been subjected to 'persecution'. In this column only last month we highlighted the absurdity and futility of this whole exercise. And quite apart from the fact that, as we emphasised at the time, vast numbers of immigrants of this kind are able to escape the net by getting into the UK and then disappearing into the woodwork while their claims are being investigated, there is the reality that the numbers of 'refugees' found to have entered under false pretences and subsequently marked down for deportation constitute a mere fraction of the total of Third World immigrants coming into this country — by far the majority of whom are here perfectly legally under present rules and against whom the Government has no barriers whatsoever.

Just as if to maintain the illusion that the Major Government is carrying out some 'tough' policy with regard to immigration, we have in recent weeks witnessed agonised protests from Shadow Home Secretary Roy Hattersley that its measures in this regard are far too 'harsh' and that, in the outcome, many would-be migrants who have quite genuine claims to be classified as refugees are going to be denied sanctuary and thereby may suffer imprisonment and even death back in their home countries. Such pathetic blatherings, convincing as they are only to the bleeding-heart liberal minority among British voters, serve conveniently to stamp the actions of the Tory Government with an image of 'firmness', 'good sense' and 'resolution' that is wholly unmerited.

Here again, the 'thesis — antithesis — synthesis' trick manifests itself. Have someone propose some patently absurd 'open-door' immigration policy that almost everyone is going to reject. Attack that policy as going much too far. Then synthesise things by offering an alternative policy which leaves the door at least substantially ajar and through which many immigrants can still pass in ease and comfort with public opinion in the meantime being nicely pacified!

The truth of this whole matter is that Britain's immigration problem does not mainly arise from the numbers of Third World peoples currently seeking entry into the country by means of fraudulent 'refugee' claims; the problem is constituted by the vastly greater numbers of people still flooding in by all manner of other means — plus the millions already here who have come in since the flood started in the 1950s or who are the descendants of those coming in as part of that flood.

The problem is going to be tackled when, and only when, we have a government which recognises that the issue at stake is not that of who is a genuine refugee and who is a bogus refugee, not who is a legal immigrant and who is an illegal immigrant, but an issue essentially of race — of whether it is a good thing or a bad thing that we have present in this United Kingdom a population of several millions of people of non-European stock whose genetic and cultural make-up rule that they can never be properly integrated into the British Nation without the latter suffering irreparable harm in the way of the loss of its traditional qualities and identity. As long as we ignore this central reality, and persist in bringing the mentality of lawyers to bear on a matter involving the to-be-or-not-to-be of national survival we shall be doing nothing more than tickling at the problem.

The Maxwell mystery

Few more repulsive specimens ever stalked the British scene than press tycoon Robert Maxwell, whose body was fished out of the Mediterranean last month after he had disappeared from his luxury yacht a few hours earlier. Maxwell (born in Czechoslovakia as Jan Ludwig Hoch), like so many foreigners who have found it convenient to make their base in this country, loved to depict himself as a staunch 'British patriot' always dedicated to the interests of his adopted land. In fact, throughout his life he championed a series of causes which could not by the wildest stretch of imagination be identified with any such interests. The two most prominent of these were the Labour Party, on whose behalf Maxwell served for a while as an MP, and the publication of the Daily Mirror and its associated magazines and newspapers, the latter of which included The European, a paper dedicated to making propaganda in support of Britain's full integration into a European super-state.

Maxwell's career has been amply chronicled in the many obituaries written about him since his death, and it would be a waste of space here to repeat all this in detail. One little anecdote, however, stands out which somehow illustrates better than anything else the nature of the man. When serving in the uniform of the British Army in the closing weeks of World War II he came across an unarmed German civilian and promptly shot him dead. Maxwell was reported to have never been able to understand why, in later years when he proudly and gloatingly recalled this incident in the company of influential Britons, they did not register enthusiastic approval.

Despite the ostentatious way in which Maxwell throughout his life decked himself out in the Union Jack, he revealed in the days following his death the reality of where his true loyalties lay: he was buried in Jerusalem in accordance with his clearly specified wishes, put on record two or three years previously. Oddly enough, this came just at a time when the news wires were full of scandal concerning alleged links between Maxwell and Israeli Intelligence — links that are explored in a penetrating article by Ivor Benson written for the November/December issue of Behind the News and reprinted in this issue of our own magazine.

Almost immediately upon Maxwell's death the news media rushed with almost indecent haste to declare that his end came as the result of a 'heart attack'. This was on the basis of an extremely hasty Spanish coroner's report derived from an equally hasty autopsy on his body carried out by a pathologist with the unusual Spanish name of Luisa Garcia Cohen. This verdict, however, did not win common acceptance all round, and later examinations led to the cause of death becoming the subject of considerable dispute. As we go to press, this dispute is still raging, and the 'natural causes' theory of Maxwell's death now seems to have taken a back seat behind the more recently advanced theories of suicide and murder. There is not the space here to go into the complexities of argument necessary to resolve which of the latter two, if either, is correct. All that might be said is that evidence tends to dispel the suggestion that Maxwell (Hoch) was by a disposition a suicidal type, and that, just supposing he had been, there would surely have been much more instant and comfortable ways for him to vacate this world than by drowning.

One newspaper, in speculating whether Maxwell might have been murdered, made the wry comment that, as far as motive was concerned, the number of people who would have liked him dead could fill the whole of the cells of every police station in Britain — an observation with which we would not dare to argue! In seriousness though, we must here apply the golden rules of detection whereby consideration must be given, not only to motive, but also to opportunity and capability. By these criteria, the range of possibilities becomes somewhat narrowed.

The occasional newspaper columnist has been so bold as to suggest that one agency which might have had a reason to bump off Maxwell, as well as the necessary means of doing so, is the very Israeli Secret Service — Mossad — with whom the late press baron's name has been linked in the allegations mentioned earlier. Could it be that certain powerfully placed people anticipated that these allegations would become the subject of further public enquiry, even including action in the courts, and that in the process of such an enquiry Captain Bob might disclose information which might be highly embarrassing? On the other hand, could it not be the case that, even if Captain Bob did not himself make any such disclosures, they might come to light anyway as the enquiry proceeded — whereas if he were out of the way such an enquiry might never be opened?

These questions remain unanswered at the present time. Publications whose speciality is in-depth research (unlike our own, which specialises mainly in comment) may provide some of the missing answers in the coming months. It will be interesting to see what transpires.

Dancing to whose tune?

Almost every nation in the world, including our own, has a provision in its laws which empowers its government to refuse entry to any foreign visitor whose presence on its territory would not be conducive to the national or public good. We believe this prerogative to be an entirely right and necessary one, and one which, furthermore, our own Government ought to exercise much more strictly and often than it does — the vital conditions being that that exercise should be: (1) based on absolutely genuine grounds of national or public interest; and (2): applied with complete impartiality as between one individual and another.

For what justified reason might a foreign visitor be refused the right, within the aforementioned terms of reference, to enter the United Kingdom? It would surely be if there were good grounds for believing that his or her presence here might be prejudicial to national security. Alternatively, it would be if such presence constituted some threat, if not to national security, then to public order. Beyond these considerations, no other criteria should operate. And most certainly there should no interest other than the public and national one allowed to influence the Government's decision in these regards.

Now let us look at two cases which have occurred during this year and observe the contrasting government attitudes towards them.

In April there arrived in Britain a notorious black American agitator by the name of the Reverend (!!!) Al Sharpton. Sharpton had a long record as a troublemaker back in the US, and his intended itinerary when in this country included well-known spots of racial unrest, including the black ghettos of Bristol, Birmingham, Tottenham and Brixton — all scenes of heavy rioting a few years previously. This itinerary was published in advance and must therefore have been known to the Government.

Immediately upon his arrival, Sharpton added a further engagement to his schedule. Being informed of a black anti-racist march through South London, he announced that he would join it. Strutting at the head of the march column, he led it to the British National Party Bookshop in Welling, where his followers threw bricks at the shop building. Only strong police reinforcements at this location prevented greater violence.

None of this, however, induced the Government to decide that Sharpton's

SHARPTON IN BRITAIN
If Leuchter could be banned from entry, why not he also?

presence in this country was prejudicial to public order and to deport him forthwith. The following weekend he was still here, being the star speaker at an anti-white hate rally at Friends House in Euston. He then left the UK in his own good time, having meanwhile been granted generous time on a number of TV chat shows.

Last month another visitor from the United States was due to appear in this country. This was the engineer Fred Leuchter. Mr. Leuchter is white. He has never been any kind of public agitator. He has no criminal record but is a perfectly respectable citizen. His purpose was not to go to places around the country well known as centres of public unrest but to deliver one lecture in London at an indoor location to an audience whose entry was by ticket only. The lecture was based upon Mr. Leuchter's professional expertise and experience as a designer of systems of execution by means of lethal gas used by certain American states, and upon his inspection of the alleged 'gas chambers' said to be used at Auschwitz concentration camp for the purpose of mass extermination of inmates, mainly Jews. Mr. Leuchter's thesis was that this inspection had clearly established to his own satisfaction that such facilities at Auschwitz could never have been used for gassing — let alone the gassing of people in the vast numbers claimed.

As soon as the intended Leuchter meeting was announced, Britain's Jewish community got to work to agitate for a ban on him by the Government — this community having not previously made the slightest whimper of a suggestion that the Rev. Sharpton should be banned. A short time afterwards an official of the Home Office sent a letter to Mr. Leuchter which began as follows:-

Dear Mr. Leuchter,

I am directed by the Home Secretary to inform you that he has given directions that you should not be given entry to the United Kingdom on the grounds that your presence here would not be conducive to the public good.

The letter went on to state that the directions had been issued by Home Secretary Kenneth Baker personally and that Leuchter was not entitled to exercise the customary right of appeal against the ruling.

Not conducive to the public good? In just what way not conducive to the public good? Was Mr. Leuchter's presence here any kind of threat to Britain's national security? It is difficult to see how. Was it any kind of threat to public order? It is difficult to see how it could have been that either. Mr. Leuchter had not given anyone any reason to believe that he was going to agitate against anybody, let alone incite them to acts of illegality — as there had been every reason to believe the Rev. Sharpton would do when his past record and intended itinerary were taken into account. Yet Sharpton was allowed in and Leuchter was banned. By just what criteria were these contradictory decisions made?

Well, as many of our readers will know, Mr. Leuchter's friends managed to circumvent the ban on him and get him into this country to the great embarrassment of the authorities. To loud cheers, he took the platform at the meeting in London at which he had been scheduled to speak.

But he had not spoken for more than about 10 minutes before his speech was interrupted by police. He was thereupon arrested and taken to the cells at Chelsea police station, where he was held for two nights before finally being sent back to the US.

The contrasting reactions of the Government in these two cases should set many British people thinking deeply about the question of who actually controls this country and in whose interests. Some readers in the past have taken our magazine to task over its oft-repeated claims that the Jewish lobby is frequently seen to be issuing orders to our Government and having those orders instantly obeyed. We made such a claim when the Government, under Jewish pressure, moved a bill through parliament to enable it to prosecute elderly citizens in this country for alleged 'war crimes'. We make it again after the disgraceful treatment of Fred Leuchter, as catalogued in this report.

This is not the end of the story. The latest news is that the Rev. Sharpton, after all the trouble he caused on his previous visit, and despite the fact that back in the US he has served terms of imprisonment for breaking the law, arrived in Britain for a second visit last month — with the Home Office again placing no barriers in his way.

Touching down at Heathrow on November 22nd, he announced that he was here for three days of marches, rallies, speeches and TV appearances. At a press conference at the airport he warned of a world on the brink of a "racial uprising" because black people were not prepared to "be walked on any more." For good measure, he also attacked Britain's police.

Are there not ample grounds, in view both of the Rev. Sharpton's past record and of his pronouncements made on his recent arrival in Britain, for believing that his presence here would, to use the Home Office's own words, "not be conducive to the public good"?

Yet this creature is considered by our Government to be a fit visitor to this country, while Fred Leuchter is not!

Just who is running Britain — and for whom?

WATCH OUT — THEY'RE TRYING TO BREAK UP OUR COUNTRY!

Behind the devolution argument, says JOHN TYNDALL, we should be on the look-out for forces whose aim is the destruction of Britain as a nation

THERE COME moments in the affairs of nations when it is necessary to suspend debate on those issues that lie at the surface of things and to take what might aptly be termed the 'transcendental view' — to relegate momentary squabbles to their correct place in the order of perspectives and to look to the far-reaching consequences that lie beyond.

Such an approach comes not easily to the party politician, for his preoccupation is with those issues thought likely to affect his and his colleagues' seats in parliament in the immediate future. He is anyway probably the type who would not care to concern himself with such bigger matters in the first place; he is selected to be where he is because of his perceived usefulness in the game of winning elections, and that requires that he demonstrate a level of intellect suitably tuned to the aspirations of the chattering crowd in the shopping precinct. To climb above this babble, and to give his mind to those questions determining the destinies of nations, is an exertion that is beyond his powers, alien to his disposition and probably prejudicial to his career. So he joins exuberantly in the bun-fight of the moment, not knowing where it is leading and not inclined to care if he knew.

Coming from generalities to specifics, let us look for a moment at the current rumpus now being enacted over the question of devolution for Scotland. The issue has come, yet again, to the forefront of public controversy because of the lamentable showing of the Conservative Party in elections north of the border. With a now quite small minority of Scots voting to be subjects of a Tory Government, the question has arisen: why then should they remain so? On superficial examination, this would seem to justify the claim for a Scottish parliament to legislate over affairs internal to Scotland while leaving the national parliament in Westminster with limited powers akin to one existing under a federal system. Then taking this logic to its extremes there are those who will say that it vindicates the claim of the Scottish National Party (SNP) to complete 'independence', in other words separation from Britain in all senses of the word and the setting up of a Scottish republic — a concept that has not yet won majority support in Scotland if the electoral figures of the SNP are any guide but which could conceivably do so in the future if present trends continue. Indeed it might not require an SNP victory in Scotland for this to happen; it could come about through a constitutional crisis developing from devolution and the resulting conflict that could easily ensue between Edinburgh and London. Labour and Liberal Democrat politicians in Scotland, while not so far embarked on the bandwagon of separatism, could well jump aboard it if it appeared expedient for them to do so. Few, if any, are strongly principled defenders of the Union; most regard that institution as an expendable commodity, to be retained if useful, to be sacrificed if necessary.

BACKLASH

Backlash against all this was predictable enough. English politicians with visions as petty and narrow as those of their Scottish counterparts have not failed to perceive the possibilities pregnant in the developing divisions. If the Scots should not be obliged to suffer a Tory Government against their will, why should the English be obliged to suffer a Labour Government against theirs? With a separation of the ways, Conservatism would be in almost as permanent control south of the border as it would be in permanent opposition north of it — so the thinking goes. That such arrangements might be bad for the nation to which we are all supposed to belong, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, seems to be lost sight of in the gleeful rush to score points in the new game which fascinates all concerned.

Few seem to have any conception of the fact that they are acting out a script written almost as if to order by powers little concerned for the interests either of England or Scotland, to say nothing of the other parts of our Kingdom: powers that seek to conquer and eliminate the world's great nations by the device of dividing them and fragmenting them.

An enthusiastic player in this game of divide-et-impera has been the Sunday Times,

HIT THE ROAD, JOCK

Backlash is in the air as English Tory MPs turn against angry Scots. Meanwhile, Conservative leaders in Scotland remain as passionate as ever for the Union. David Hughes and Mark Leishman report

Ian Lang, secretary of state for Scotland, spent not over the House of Commons' parade ground from his office, one of the few Tories in Whitehall. Across in St James's Park, the branches of the trees tossed in last week's gales. Behind the high windows of Lang's elegant room an inquest was under way.

Why had the Scottish Conservatives lost the November 7 by-election fight for the blue-chip Tory seat of Kilmarnock and Denside, where Lang had been educated as a boy? What was to be done? Should the Tories, now whittled down to only nine seats (out of 72) north of the border, bend with the Anglophobic wind blowing through Scotland? With a general election no more than seven months away, should they flit with the devolutionary rhetoric of Labour and the Liberal Democrats?

Lang turned to the men who help him govern Scotland: Alan Young, his political adviser; Michael Forsyth, his combative young minister of state; and the under-secretary, Allan Stewart. Lord James Douglas-Hamilton and Lord Strathclyde.

what they want or lose their last supporters. But Forsyth argued that to do so now would be an act of surrender. Forsyth's fellow ministers are from a softer mould than he is. Stewart hides a first-class mind behind snout-chop whiskers that have earned him the job of being one of Scotland's last tourist attractions. Douglas-Hamilton, brother of the Duke of Hamilton and an MP despite his title, is a boxing blue but looks and sounds more of a Bertie Wooster than a bruiser. Strathclyde, 31, has been the Scottish Office's sole voice in the Lords for less than a year.

But they too were adamant. Schooled in the creed of Scottish Unionism, they were not about to haul down the Union flag. Lang subsequently given the nod of agreement by several key Tories. The Sunday Times argued that it would be in Tory interests to give Scotland home rule, because this would cut the number and influence of Scottish MPs at Westminster and risk Labour's chances of ever ruling England again.

"There is no such thing as a safe Scottish Tory seat," it said, "and it is perfectly possible, even if the Tories win a fourth term in London, that there will not be enough Scottish Tory MPs to man the Scottish Office. The Union is now composed of a ragged Tory England and a badly anti-Tory Scotland."

It added: "Scotland seems determined to replace Albania as Europe's only remaining socialist country. Even the Scottish Establishment, which depends heavily on the state for its power and privileges because it is professional middle class law, medicine, education and the bureaucracy rather than entrepreneurship, is no friend of the market economy... The more the Tories have tried to buy votes in Scotland by throwing money at it

Union-bashing: many Scots want home rule or full independence; now some Tory MPs say they can go the other way. English nationalists, warning that the Labour party, in which Scottish institutions look after Scottish affairs and Scottish members of parliament dabble in English affairs, would be unacceptable to the people of England. The Tory rout around him were declining. The consequences were immediate. As a meeting of the Tory backbench 1922 Committee after they blast for more," one Tory said after the meeting, "it's time to take them on." The depths of the resentment are evident in the results of a Mori poll of 100 Tory MPs for The Sunday Times, which show that a large majority (80 per cent) support the number of Scottish seats at Westminster cut even without some rule for Scotland.

PUBLICITY: Labour leaders say the Tory party is signing its own death warrant in its opposition to devolution. Privately, however, they are aware that if Major wins the general election, he will agree to the union with strong backbench support, as a way of keeping Labour permanently out of power.

Labour has the added problem that three of its frontbench stars — John Smith, Gordon Brown and Robin Cook — while Scots, are more preoccupied with their ambitions for power at Westminster. They fear that Labour is unlikely to form anything better than a minority government after the next election and would need support from the Liberal Democrats, who see the logic in cutting Scottish representation in the Commons.

"Scotland is a real problem for the Tories — but it is also an opportunity," said one Labour frontbencher. "Margaret Thatcher was wedded to the Union, but Major is extremely well briefed and generally interested," said one member of the Labour Parliament. "The contrast with Margaret Thatcher was marked. She would have told us the area had to stand on its own two feet."

The meeting took place just 24 hours after British Rail announced it would site its new Eurofranchise terminal in Lanarkshire, promising 8,000 new jobs. As ever, the Scottish Labour MPs wanted more. Before joining the Major campaign, John Reid, MP for Motherwell North and a member of New Labour's frontbench team, said "only the Labour party has the mandate more government cash and the mandate to do with the government."

Senior Tories say there is no immediate need to do anything about Scotland, especially since a last-minute, pre-election convention to home rule would be met with sceptical derision north of the border.

"It is not as if we have 30 or 40 seats at risk in Scotland," one said. "There are only nine seats at

PROMOTING DIVISION

This headline and picture which recently appeared in the Sunday Times were clearly calculated to set Scots and English against each other. The picture is a sneering portrayal of the Scot as just a few English would like to caricature him.

benefits of union with England and Wales will be replaced by those derived from a looser 'union' with a larger and more prosperous market place. Labour and the Liberal Democrats in Scotland also look to Europe — but to the Europe of regions, rather than nations. The new Scottish parliament, they argue, would be as concerned with Brussels and Strasbourg as with Westminster."

Independence in Europe? The very idea represents a contradiction in terms so obvious that an averagely intelligent child should be able to see it, but liberal internationalists of the kind represented by Labour, the Liberal Democrats and — yes, the Scottish so-called 'Nationalists' have never been over-concerned about contradictions; their driving impulse is not to serve Scotland but to break up Britain, and any piece of verbiage that is useful to that purpose is permissible and welcome. They all look to Europe but, as the article says, it is the Europe of regions rather than nations. This thoroughly suits M. Delors & Co., for regions are, as indicated before, small enough to manipulate and control, whereas nations like the United Kingdom might offer stiffer resistance to that process.

Also significant in the article is the reference to the SNP being attracted by the 'benefits' of union with Europe rather than those of union with England and Wales — these benefits being measured in economic terms as deriving from "a larger and more prosperous market place." Well, the SNP is entitled to believe that Scotland would obtain more economic benefit from Europe than from Britain — although we would strongly disagree with that assessment. What it is not entitled to do in such circumstances is call itself a 'nationalist' movement. To the true nationalist, national freedom and national identity have priority over all economic considerations. Yet it seems that to the so-called 'nationalists' of the SNP economic considerations are uppermost. It is the prosperous 'market place' that is the goal, not the ideals of nationhood and heritage.

FOMENTING DISCORD

Along with the divide-and-conquer game played by such papers as the Sunday Times, there has been a clearly perceptible trend throughout the media as a whole which would seem calculated to set English and Scots against each other. I have lost count of the newspaper and magazine articles that I have read over the past year or two which have attempted to persuade us all of the dislike that English and Scots are alleged to feel towards each other — indeed, so rabid has been some of the language used to stoke up this mutual antipathy that, if used in description of non-white ethnic groups, it might well have rendered the writers and publishers liable to prosecution for 'race hatred'! What is the truth of it all? I can only speak as one who regularly visits Scotland in the course of promoting the British National Party. Once I open my mouth there I am immediately identified as English solely on account of my accent, even if I am not exactly so in terms of pedigree. With a very few exceptions, I have met with nothing with warmth and friendliness. I know very well that this is the case equally with Scots who come south. Of the presumed antagonism between people both a paper standing as a pillar of liberal orthodoxy and committed to all the causes beloved of the rulers of the late 20th century. 'Politically correct' to a degree greater perhaps than any other organ of contemporary 'public opinion' in Britain, the ST crusades for One World, European Union, the United Nations, Anti-Racism and every other brand of modern progressivism with almost evangelical fervour. To the uninitiated, it might seem paradoxical that such an impeccably internationalist paper should in recent months have given up so much of its space to articles, reports and readers' letters favourable to a nationalist movement, but this is what the Sunday Times has done with regard to 'nationalism' in Scotland. Now, not content with this, it has extended its campaign to the fostering of anti-Scottish 'nationalism' in England. 'Home rule for England' it screamed in a leader headline on November 10th, underneath which was a reiteration of the theme that English electors when voting Tory in a majority should not have Socialist Governments imposed upon them by virtue of Labour's plentiful MPs in Scotland. It then followed this up with an article the next weekend entitled 'Hit the road, Jock'. This explained that while Scottish Tories are as strong as ever in their support of the Union many of their English colleagues are self-interestedly beginning to see the attractions of separation, promising as it does an English parliament with an entrenched Conservative ascendancy.

DIVIDE-AND-CONQUER

The riddle of an internationalist paper's championship of 'nationalist' causes becomes easily explicable once we recognise the name of the game. The name of the game is of course the breaking up of the great nation-states in order that they may be more easily merged into an international super-state — in the case of Britain the super-state being that of Europe. The Eurocrats would much more preferably deal with regions than with nations because such regions are much smaller and therefore much more easily manageable. This is all related to a similar paradox — or at least an apparent paradox: the drive of the Scottish Nationalists to win 'independence' from Britain while their policy at the same time is to integrate Scotland thoroughly with Europe. To any rational person the first of these two objectives is totally inconsistent with the second, and that very inconsistency calls into question the sincerity of those who clamour for greater Scottish 'independence', whether it be in the extreme form advocated by the SNP or the more limited form pursued by the devolutionists who dominate the Labour and Liberal Democratic Parties in Scotland. Sarah Baxter, writing in New Statesman Society on the 15th November, summarised the position of the Scottish 'home rulers' thus:-

"The SNP has set its heart on 'independence in Europe' in the hope that the sides of the border I have seen very little in real life — and nothing remotely approaching the antagonism that is felt by large numbers of Scots and English towards Third World immigrants and their offspring, who are, according to media commentators, loved by nearly everybody!

Some of the newspaper accounts of alleged 'anti-Englishness' on the part of the Scots go completely overboard in their flight into fancy. A number of articles I have read recently on the subject spoke of the fierce passion with which Scots sang Flower of Scotland and rooted for their team in the World Cup rugby match against England at Murrayfield, and the writers deduced from this that the sentiment underlying it all was hatred of the visitors. That is puerile rubbish; rugby and soccer contests between the four home countries of the United Kingdom have always aroused strong partisanship among the supporters of the respective sides with this only rarely ever incorporating any real antagonism towards opponents. All supporters like to see their own team win, and get carried away with the drama and competitiveness of the occasion — but probably little more so than the supporters of club teams situated no more than three or four miles from each other. Has anyone witnessed the partisan passion at an Arsenal v. Spurs match or a 'derby' between Liverpool and Everton?

One writer of an article in the Sunday Times, a Scot who had come home after living and working in England, claimed to have encountered bitter hostility from a man he had known well in his home town in former days. According to his own account, this man said:-

"You're no better than the rest of them — flash bastards who come up now and again to tell us how proud they are to be Scotsmen and how happy they are to come home. Well, you, Billy Connolly and the rest can stick it. You've been tainted by that lot down there, pal."

Whilst it would be hasty to claim dogmatically that such words could never have been spoken, one cannot resist the thought that they sound just a little improbable. And if in fact they were just as quoted is it not possible that they were intended in jest — as a leg-pull against an old friend? There is such a thing as poetic licence, and it seems to me not inconceivable that the writer of the article, knowing what his editor was expecting of him, felt that such a reported comment would suitably embroider his main theme — which was of growing discontent in Scotland with the present status-quo — without detracting from the basic truthfulness of it. At any rate, the quotation certainly helped to accomplish the Sunday Times's basic objective, which clearly is to sow the greatest possible seeds of division and dislike between Scots and English in order to undermine the bonds that hold together this nation that we call Britain. Much of the same can be observed in newspaper writers' attempts to divide Brits from their kinfolk in Australia by exaggerated reports of 'pom-bashing' in the latter country — reports that are not borne out by accounts I have had from compatriots who have lived in Australia or the Australians who frequently write to me. Of course such things are not non-existent, but are they as widespread as claimed in the press? All the facts seem to point to the contrary.

We can understand the meaning of all these trends when we appreciate that we are living in a world in which those who control the organs of mass communication are working in accordance with a clearly determined set of policies. Two vital elements among these policies, which are seen as complementary to one another, are: (1) the sowing of seeds of discord among members of the same race; and (2) the creation of artificial bonds of affection and mutual attraction between different races. When this two-part strategy is recognised, the seeming paradoxes and contradictions of the mass media fit into place as alternating weapons in the war against Britain and the white peoples.

THE TRUTH ABOUT DEVOLUTION

As for the devolution idea now being used to sow discord between peoples in the English and Scottish parts of our Kingdom, this rests on a pathetic myth: the myth that the manifest national failures stemming from the Westminster system of government will somehow find their remedy by the setting up of local parliaments in Scotland and elsewhere which will merely serve as miniature reproductions of the same failed system. This is like a doctor whose prescription of quack 'cures' has exacerbated rather than relieved a state of ill-health among his patients running and telling them that the answer to their maladies is a renewed course of the same treatment — only this time by the method of dispensing it through a network of small local surgeries rather than from one larger central surgery. The patients will need to travel less far to obtain their prescriptions but the medicine they get in the end will be just the same!

Of course, the theory behind the devolution package is that by bringing government closer to the people by means of local assemblies we will make it more 'representative' because more responsive to the people's will. This again is a complete fallacy. To begin with, what has brought about Britain's decline is not lack of 'representative' government (whatever that is) but lack of good government. We have lacked good government for three fundamental reasons: (1) our political system, and the entire climate in which politics are conducted, ensure the elevation to the top offices of those who are the least fitted to rule; (2) the same system ensures that whatever calibre of persons get their hands on the reins of government the framework of party politics within which they are forced to operate makes it quite impossible for them to govern effectively anyway; (3) all government in Britain, under whatever party, operates within the constraints and restrictions of a common national ideology — the ideology of 'liberalism' — which is based on false and unworkable perceptions of the nature of the world in which we live; consequently, every vital decision of state, being a decision arrived at in obedience to 'liberal' principles, is liable to worsen the very problems it is intended to overcome. Conducting government in accordance with the textbook of liberalism is like navigating the world's continents and oceans with the aid of false maps — one is bound to end up at a destination entirely different from the one intended.

No basic changes in these conditions are envisaged in any of the devolution schemes now being put forward. The people of Scotland, and possibly in time those of Wales and England also, will simply be faced with an increased tax bill in order to pay for an extra layer of government which will be conducted in the same manner, by the same kinds of politicians and in deference to the same idols of ideology as the one at Westminster which has so manifestly failed them for so long in the past. Having taken a road presented to them as excitingly new, they will go all around the mulberry bush only to end up exactly where they started: with the same outworn political institutions and the same dwarfish calibre of political leaders. What is going to be the benefit of that?

HOW REPRESENTATIVE WILL DEVOLVED GOVERNMENT BE?

But there is another point. Even supposing that there is some merit in the theory that government will be better by virtue of being more 'representative' because closer to the people being governed, just how representative in practice would a government of Scotland be, for instance, by reason of being elected by Scots from among the parties presently dominating the political scene there? Let us imagine the Scottish electorate, having witnessed at an uncomfortably close range, the appalling consequences of multi-racialism in the cities of England, calling on the parties ruling them to take measures to ensure that such evils never visit themselves on Scotland. Can anyone see the heads of those parties taking the slightest notice of their representations? Whether control of Scottish domestic affairs be vested in Labour, the Liberal Democrats or the SNP, we can be quite sure that the controllers would treat the feelings of their electors with the same olympian contempt that their counterparts have done for so long at Westminster. The attitudes of Labour and the Liberal Democrats towards this question are generally known; what is less known, perhaps to the people of Scotland as well as to those elsewhere, is the attitude of the SNP, which makes great play of its 'nationalism' and purports to speak for the Scottish people as if by special right. Here is what the SNP says in a leaflet devoted to race:-

"In an independent Scotland all rights and liberties will be enjoyed by all persons irrespective of any grounds such as race, creed, colour, religion, personal beliefs or status.

"The SNP will campaign for greater attention to ethnic minority cultures to increase understanding in a multi-racial Scotland.

"The constitution of the SNP promises that in an independent Scotland there will be no discrimination on the basis of race, sex, creed or colour.

"The SNP takes its commitment to opposing racism very seriously and anti-racist principle underpins many policies.

"There will be no place for racism in an independent Scotland."

All of which prompts us to ask the authors of this leaflet: have you gone out onto the streets and asked the people of Scotland whether they want their land to become multi-racial? Have you actually sought their consent for turning the towns and cities of Scotland into replicas of London, Birmingham, Leicester, Liverpool, Bradford, et al, with large ghettos containing ethnic groups and cultures far removed from the native tradition? If my conversations with Scots are anything to go by, the SNP has most certainly never done any such thing, for if it had it most certainly would never have dared to print a leaflet containing the hypocritical drivel that can be seen in this one. Scots are, if anything, more stoutly determined to maintain their own traditions, customs and identity than their fellow Britons to the south of them — and the big popular response the British National Party is now meeting with in Scotland (bigger proportionately than in England) is evidence of this. If such bodies as the SNP, who are continually shouting about the need to have Scotland governed in accordance with the will of the Scottish people, were to be true to their professed beliefs, they would shun multi-racialism like the plague and adopt a firm policy of 'Scotland for the Scots'. Of course they never will. Their mission is to destroy Britain, not to do anything for Scotland.

PROTECTING JOBS

Imagine another scenario in an 'independent' Scotland. Due to high unemployment brought on by EC imports, a large body of public opinion clamours for Scottish industries to be protected. Can anyone imagine either a Labour, Liberal Democrat or SNP Government being responsive to this clamour? It would not be the voice of the Scottish people that would regulate the actions of such a government but the dictates of the European bureaucracy, which most certainly would forbid any national measures being taken to stem the import flood and safeguard Scottish jobs. Again, the presence of a parliament located in Edinburgh would no more secure representation of either the interests or the aspirations of the Scottish people than does a parliament in London today — not at least, as would be certain, with people of precisely the same ilk holding office.

The truth of the matter is that there are no major problems besetting the United Kingdom that are especially peculiar to Scotland. There are of course local questions there which demand special attention, just as there are in other parts of the UK, and the best way to give all these questions the attention they require is to institute a more effective system of government for the Kingdom as a whole, with political leaders of an entirely new and different calibre in charge of affairs and with an apparatus of government at their command which will give them the power to act effectively and quickly wherever action is needed. The kind of reforms necessary to this purpose are entirely different from the reforms envisaged by the devolutionists, who imagine that they can compensate for the shortcomings of an inefficient system merely by spreading the inefficiency around over many places instead of centralising it in one place.

PRIORITY OF THE UNION

This is an apt point at which to return to the opening theme of this article: the need for us to raise our eyes from the minutiae of the devolution debate and scan the horizons beyond. To our movement there is one priority which overrides all: this is the maintenance of the Union of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. We are British Nationalists rather than English or Scottish Nationalists, although our British Nationalism allows for the splendour of the distinct traditions that go to make up our Kingdom and the richness in diversity that gives it so much colour and produces from it a particularly wide range of national genius.

Unlike the politicians of the present parties of Westminster, we consider the unity of the Kingdom to transcend by far in importance the question of which party of government currently holds office over it; in fact we would far prefer to have a United Kingdom ruled by a government to which we were opposed than have that Kingdom split into separate states some of which might have governments closer to our liking. Within the game of contemporary party politics, however, different priorities prevail. Our party hacks would quite gladly see Great Britain disappear from the world map if it were to be shown that their little political gangs would thereby benefit. They are like children playing with a great family heirloom: by fighting over it they are liable to drop it and smash it to pieces. Then, rather than their recognising the enormity of what they had done, each would rush to grab as many fragments as he could. That is the calibre of which today's politicians are made. They can build nothing; they can only wreck. They have wrecked an empire. They will now wreck Britain itself, if we do not quickly stop them.

THE DINOSAUR WHICH SHOULD BE SLAIN

It is high time for Britain to get out of NATO, says DOMINIC STUART

AS the obituary is being written for the now defunct Warsaw Pact, perhaps it is time to take a look at that other great dinosaur — NATO.

NATO, otherwise known as the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation, was formed in 1949, and then only consisted of the UK, USA, France, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Luxembourg, Norway, Denmark, Canada,

Iceland and Portugal — with Greece, Turkey, West Germany and Spain joining later. NATO's military command structure does not, however, include France, Spain or Iceland, which (with the exception of the latter, which has no armed forces) prefer to keep their armed forces under their own control. Thus the united front is shown — two of the biggest countries in the alliance refuse to put their forces under NATO's control and one of them (albeit small) has no armed forces at all!

Apparently the parties to the treaty agree to treat an attack on one as an attack on them all; a fat lot of help France, Spain and Iceland would be. Come to think of it, who helped us in 1982 when the Falklands were invaded? In fact, less than two months before joining NATO, Spain abstained in a vote at the United Nations Security Council which condemned the Argentine invasion — interestingly, a non-vote registered also by the USSR, China and Poland; the United States took a whole month to pledge support for their 'closest ally' by ordering economic sanctions, and this was only (in the words of General Alexander Haig) "as a result of Argentina's failure to accept a compromise"! As for France, I think we all know where the Exocets, Mirages and Super-Etendards come from; in fact nearly 40 per-cent of the combat aircraft deployed against us by the Argentines were sold to them by the Frogs.

Contd. overleaf

Then let us not forget the Germans; in the 15-month period from February 1983 to April 1984 they managed to sell the Argentines four extremely capable German-built guided-missile destroyers of the MEKO 360 class, as well as supplying, between 1980 and 1983, the technology which enabled the Argentines to build six guided-missile frigates of the MEKO 140 class, a package including eighty Exocets.

With allies like these, who needs enemies! Perhaps indeed the greatest threat to Britain comes from within NATO. But enough of this; let's take a look at the contributions of the members and see who gains.

ADVANTAGES TO AMERICA

For all their whingeing, the Americans really don't do too badly out of NATO; by maintaining a sizeable army in Western Europe they carry a lot of power by means of the simple threat of removing it. They moan to us about the burden to the American taxpayer (and with good cause) of having one of the highest percentages of GNP spent on defence but they get very agitated when it is pointed out that not much more than half of their defence budget is actually spent on NATO — which compares very unfavourably with those of most European members, which amount to 100 per-cent. The Americans also found trouble keeping up with the Long-Term Defence Programme, which had a target of 3 per-cent defence expenditure growth per annum in real terms. By the early to mid-1980s almost all of the European members had, due to economic recession, fallen behind. This caused much friction in the alliance, with the Americans claiming a lack of commitment from Europe; but then not long later, in 1985, the Americans themselves had to fall behind, thus proving their 'holier and thou' attitude to be groundless.

Another thing that causes agitation across the Atlantic is mention of the Americans' almost protectionist defence procurement policy. For example, the UK buys $2.3 in arms from the US for every $1 we sell to them. The West Germans suffer an even worse imbalance: $2.8 to $1. Worse off still are France: $6.3 to $1; Holland: $9 to $1 and Italy: a staggering $11.5 to $1. This is not simply a case of American equipment being best; on the contrary, in many cases it is the opposite. Top European equipment doesn't get purchased for the US armed forces because it isn't American. There are exceptions, like the rapier missile and the 105mm light gun, but the American rivals to these weapons were so poor that Congress had no alternative but to accept US Air Force and Army proposals to buy British.

BIG BROTHER GETS HIS WAY

Despite efforts to create a two-way street in weapons trade, things do not get better — especially when one of the 'big successes' of the two-way street is the adoption of the per-cent — less than half Greece's expenditure and still less than the US percentage devoted to NATO.

This having been said, it would be wrong to give the impression that NATO was dependent upon the US providing the big pillar which keeps it all up. It must be remembered that money isn't the only criterion — we can't just throw pounds, dollars, francs and deutschmarks at our would be enemies. One pound spent by the US won't be equivalent to one pound spent by the UK.

What matters is not defence expenditure but defence capability. The truth is that in the European theatre of NATO European members make up 90 per-cent of the ground forces, 90 per-cent of the armoured divisions, 80 per-cent of the tanks, 80 per-

SUPPLIED TO ENEMIES BY 'ALLIES'

The Exocet missile (above) caused several deaths of British servicemen in the Falklands War of 1982. The missile, along with other hardware including the Mirage jet fighter, was supplied to the Argentines by France, who is supposed to be Britain's 'ally' in NATO — though French forces are not subordinated to the organisation's command structure.

German 120mm gun and the Belgian 7.62mm machine gun on the M1 Abrams main battle tank. At present there can be no improvement on the situation all round, when eleven firms in seven NATO countries make anti-tank weapons, eighteen firms in seven countries make surface-to-air missiles and eight firms in six countries make air-to-air weapons! This makes a nonsense of the pro-NATO arguments that the organisation has had a rationalising and cost-reducing effect upon defence procurement. The reality is simple: in any gang the biggest member has the greatest influence. As America spends ten times more on defence than the UK and twelve times more than the French and Germans, the US defence industry is given a massive headstart, which is aided by Congress's paranoia about buying foreign weapons.

However, the US does put a lot into the alliance. US defence expenditure in 1983, for example, was 6.9 per-cent of GNP, a figure topped only by Greece. It hardly seems fair that Greece, a relatively poor nation, should spend 7.1 per-cent of its GNP on defence while the industrial super-power of Europe, West Germany, spent a mere 3.4

per-cent of the combat aircraft and 70 per-cent of the naval combatants. So the argument that we couldn't do without the Americans just doesn't stand up to the light.

DRIVE TOWARDS STANDARDISATION

Another aim of NATO is equipment standardisation. Looked at on the surface, this appears to be a good idea — everyone has the same ammunition, and if A runs out B can lend him some of his, etc., etc.

But if you dig into it a little further you can see that it isn't such a good idea. Apart from sticking all your eggs in one basket, it simply isn't possible to meet all the different requirements in one standard type of weapon.

Equipment standardisation is simply no good unless the requirements are standard. A British frigate has a different role to a German one. A German frigate is required to operate in confined waters, such as the Baltic or North Sea, in areas where the threat from the sky is greater than that from the submarine. A British frigate is usually required to operate in far more open waters, such as the Atlantic (convoy duties are the major role of the Royal Navy in wartime), where the threat from the sky is far smaller than that from the submarine. The designs should respect the different requirements.

If Britain were to maintain her own adequate and independent armed forces — by which I mean nuclear forces as well as much larger conventional forces than we have now — we would have no need for NATO. If the French can spend less in actual money than we do on defence, and maintain an indepenendent nuclear deterrent, a sizeable air force, a navy which can vie with ours for third place in the world and have a large army through national service, then we can't we?

The Swedes have never needed NATO, nor have the Finns. This is because they tailor their defence policies to their needs and not the needs of someone else several thousand miles away in a different country speaking a different language and with different interests.

Britain's defence policy should be dictated by the requirements of the defence of Britain and her unique and vital interests around the world. NATO's defence policy is dictated by the requirements of the defence of NATO. These two sets of requirements, as the Falklands have shown, are rarely one and the same.

This is why NATO is bad for Britain, and this is why Britain should pull out of it!

ISRAEL: LIGHT ON A DARK SUBJECT

IVOR BENSON looks at the implications of the Daily Mirror 'spy' story

The following article first appeared in the November/December issue of Behind the News, obtainable from PO Box 29, Sudbury, Suffolk CO10 6EF. The article was written and published before the announcement that Daily Mirror proprietor Robert Maxwell had met his death in mysterious circumstances.

SOMETHING happened in Britain last month which produced an effect rather like that of a huge flash of lightning which, just for an instant, brilliantly illuminates a world hitherto steeped in darkness.

All that happened, though, was that a Conservative member of the House of Commons, Rupert Allason, better known as the spy story writer Nigel West, made use of question time to bring to the attention of parliament certain allegations against the newspaper magnate Robert Maxwell and the foreign editor of one of his papers, the Daily Mirror, Nicholas Davies.

These allegations are contained in a book by the American investigative writer Seymour Hersh, published simultaneously in America and Europe during the same week.

Allason's motion expressed concern at the disclosures in Hersh's book, The Samson Option, that "the Daily Mirror and its proprietor Robert Maxwell have maintained a close relationship with Israel's intelligence service Mossad."

The motion referred more particularly to allegations that in 1983 Davies entered into a business partnership with an Israeli citizen, Ari Ben-Menashe, and that in 1987 their company negotiated the sale of 4,000 anti-tank missiles to Iran in contravention of the UN arms embargo.

Another accusation in The Samson Option mentioned by Allason is that the Daily Mirror's proprietor and foreign editor conspired to reveal the whereabouts of Mordecai Vanunu, the Israeli defector who had supplied the London Sunday Times with a great deal of top-secret information, including photographs, about Israel's long-concealed nuclear reactor plant and atom-bomb factory at Dimona.

Vanunu, it will be remembered, had been hiding in London after his interviews with the Sunday Times, and was then lured to Italy, whence he was kidnapped and transported to Israel for trial and imprisonment.

For good measure, a similar motion was introduced in the House of Commons by a Labour Party member, George Galloway.

Galloway expressed concern over allegations that the Daily Mirror's foreign editor, Davies, "was a long-standing and highly paid Israeli intelligence asset," and that he "had been involved in substantial arms sales to Iran and other countries over the last 10 years." It was also alleged that on Maxwell's instruction all the information about Vanunu which his staff could gather was handed over to the Israeli Embassy in London.

Next day, the Daily Mirror responded with a roar. "Dishonourable men and dirty tricks," cried a headline, accompanied by pictures of the two MPs, occupying most of the front page.

Such was the chain-reaction of consequences produced by these two motions in the House of Commons that there is just no telling where, when and how it will all end.

The Daily Mail on October 25th published on its front page a photograph allegedly showing Davies, all smiles, with a glass of iced tea in his hand, at the home of an arms dealer, Kaufman, in Ohio; and the Sun, another tabloid, joined in the controversy with a giant front-page heading, 'The liar', in repudiation of Davies' claim that he had never been in Ohio in his life.

FOREIGN EDITOR FIRED

Writs for libel were soon falling like confetti. They were served on Hersh at his press conference on October 24th. The publisher, Faber & Faber, also got writs for libel, and Allason announced that he would be suing the Daily Mirror over its 'Dishonourable men' attack. Not to be outdone, Hersh and his publisher stated that they would also bring an action against the Daily Mirror.

The drama continued to thicken. The Daily Mirror, with just one word in reverse print across the front page: 'FORGERY', condemned as 'fraudulent' a letter from an arms dealer addressed to "Dear Nick..." The signature, 'William Johnson', was said to have been forged. Unhappily for the Mirror, however, Johnson changed his mind and admitted to the Daily Mail that it was his signature and that he had met Davies for talks about an arms deal.

Forced in the end to admit that Davies

had lied about his visit to Ohio, the Mirror Group (MGN) fired the foreign editor, and the editor of the Mirror sermonised in a middle-page spread:-

"A newspaper is founded on trust. Trust between its readers and its staff. Trust between proprietor and editor. Trust, the most important of all, between an editor and his staff...Every day the Mirror's reputation is in the hands of those who create it and care passionately for everything it stands for."

Nevertheless, MGN clung to all its other denials, saying that it had "no doubt" that allegations that Davies was working for Israeli intelligence and that he had a hand in betraying Vanunu's whereabouts to the Israelis were "wholly untrue." How MGN could be so sure was not explained.

Commented smiling Hersh in Washington: "I think Nick Davies has been used as a scapegoat. There is a much bigger story than Nick Davies."

Noises coming from the headquarters of the Mirror Group (MGN) having included an announcement by Maxwell that he would seek a High Court injunction suspending distribution of the offending book, we lost no time in getting hold of a copy.

All there is to read about Maxwell and Davies will be found in the last nine pages of a 350-page hard-cover book, but there are numerous references elsewhere to Ari Ben-Menashe, a former Mossad agent who, having been tossed aside by the Israeli Government as expendable after he had been arrested in the United States, became one of Hersh's main sources of information, bringing with him sheaves of documentation. This is the man who is said to have partnered Davies in an arms sales company which operated from Davies' home in London.

CRIMINAL POLITICS

However, we should not allow the fuss and bother about Maxwell and Davies to deflect our attention from the vastly more important fact that The Samson Option exposes in a manner hardly ever equalled the essentially criminal character of modern power politics. This Hersh achieves with a most detailed exploration of the circumstances surrounding the emergence of Israel as a nuclear power; for the great underground facility in the desert at Dimona was built by French technicians while western political leaders went on pretending that they knew nothing about it (in fact they even helped to finance it).

Writes Hersh:-

"The ambivalence and hypocrisy at the top of the American Government about a nuclear-armed Israel was inevitably mirrored by the bureaucracy. By the middle of the 1960s the game was fixed: President Johnson and his advisers would pretend that the American inspections amounted to proof that Israel was not building the bomb, leaving unblemished America's newly affirmed support for nuclear non-proliferation. The men and women analysing intelligence data and writing reports for the higher-ups understood...that there was little to be gained by relaying information that those at the top did not want to know."

Ari Ben-Menashe, who had worked directly as an intelligence adviser to Yitzhak Shamir, says that one of Shamir's first actions when he became prime minister was to "initiate some kind of strategic co-operation with the Soviet Union," and that thereafter nuclear secrets supplied by the Americans were passed to the Soviet Union.

SLAVE OF TRUTH

So who is this Seymour Hersh, and by what force has he been driven to undertake so heavy a labour in order to uncover political falsehood wherever he can find it? Hersh has written a number of investigative books and was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for one of them in which he exposed the Mai Lai massacre in Vietnam. In 1983 he produced The Price of Power, a book mostly about Henry Kissinger, whom he evidently detests. Kissinger did not sue, but branded as "a slimy lie" Hersh's charge that during the 1968 presidential election he played a double role, spying for Nixon in the Humphrey camp while at the same time relaying to Humphrey any scandal he could use against Nixon.

Our own assessment is that Hersh is a most unusual socio-political phenomenon, having something in common with George Orwell but lacking Orwell's deep and wide-ranging intellect. What he does share with Orwell is a passionate detestation of untruthfulness; or, to put it the other way round, finding the truth in areas where there is so much lying and concealment has become for him a most exciting and satisfying game.

It is this super-personal role which makes it possible for him to find pleasure in tracking down thousands of individuals who 'were there', and who 'ought to know', and in going to no end of trouble to check and double-check facts which, because they could be deeply hurtful, could also be dangerous — like the statements he made about Davies and Maxwell. Indeed, without the danger, the game would be less exciting, less rewarding.

Hersh is a journalistic sleuth-hound and has no pretensions about being also an historian. Nevertheless, there is an all-important historical generalisation to be drawn from all his writing: twentieth century power politics is a vast world of lies, possibly without any precedent in recorded history. Wherever he has looked he has found — as we too have found — evidence of great power promoting its purposes under cover of lying, cheating and concealment.

Behind the News does not concern itself, like Hersh, with accumulating more detailed information, our main task being to get at the meaning of facts which are already available in abundance. However, it is encouraging to find our own total interpretation of twentieth century history strongly endorsed by the enormous quantity of new information which Hersh supplies.

So what is this 'total interpretation' of history which explains all the deception and concealment?

Answer: Last century's rival national imperialisms have been succeeded by a new global cosmopolitan financial imperialism, spearheaded by and dominated by Zionism — which is Jewish Nationalism.

In the light of this interpretation, it would have been most remarkable if Maxwell and his papers and his employees had not taken care of Israel's interests in the Vanunu affair, as alleged by Seymour Hersh.

Postscript: Susequent to the first publication of this article, reports have appeared in certain newspapers claiming that the information concerning the alleged links between Robert Maxwell and Israeli Intelligence was passed to author Seymour Hersh by a 'con-man', who later admitted it to have been his own invention. It is too early to evaluate the truth or otherwise of this claim, but even if it is established as correct it does not invalidate the main substance of Mr. Benson's article.

THOUGHT FOR THE MONTH

There can be no solution of the world's troubles which does not deal drastically with the individuals, of whatever race or country, whose object is the final subjugation of the individual to the institution — the World Bank, with the World Police Force to see that the World Bank retains total economic power. The problem is not a European problem only, or even chiefly...

No-one is likely to underrate the power and the prevalence of plain stupidity in political affairs. But anyone observing the steady and obviously conscious misrepresentation of the facts of economics and political economy, the vicious attacks made upon any professional economist unwilling to 'toe the line' so scrupulously followed by economists of repute, the determination to retain an unprivileged or even starving section of the population so that it might be used as an excuse for reducing the privileges of that portion of the population representing the advance which man has made over his environment, must agree that stupidity in the ordinary sense is not a sufficient explanation for what has occurred. It is too obvious that a policy of general enslavement, carrying with it bribes, some of considerable value, to politicians and officials who were willing to further it, and penalties for any who would oppose it, has been pursued systematically.

SCIENTIFIC FACT AND LIBERAL FICTION

Some more media nonsense on race, dissected by NOEL A. HUNT

"A lie travels around the world while Truth is putting her boots on."

Rev. C.H. Spurgeon

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH recently carried a review of a book entitled The Architect of Genocide: Himmler and the Final Solution. I wish to consider four statements made by the reviewer: (1) that "it can be stressed that the concept of purity of blood is in no way scientific;" (2) that "it is the opposite of scientific to imagine that the human species might be improved by genetic manipulation or selective breeding;" (3) that "it is true that one might breed a strain of humans with some larger limb or increased bone-headedness;" (4) that "scientists understand that any lively step forward in evolution depends on the free interplay between environment and chance."

The statements set out above constitute a faultless outline of the liberal consensus on the matters of breeding and environment. The statements are accepted as correct by the ruling school of fashionable thought, which alone is allowed to be heard in such matters.

Yet every such statement can be shown to be untrue and scientifically the sheerest moonshine. One is reminded of Nathaniel Weyl's deathless definition of liberalism as "the socialism of the mentally unkempt."

The review states that 'purity of blood' is in no way scientific. It is true that there is today no 100 per-cent pure race in the world. Yet there still remain very large pockets of relative racial purity. This is what the argument is really about: relative purity against no purity whatever. On this basis, one can validly compare the achievements in any given field of such relatively pure racial groups as, say, the Scandinavians with the achievements of the genetic olla podrida which results from massive racial cross-breeding as in, for example, the South American countries.

SURVIVAL ATTRIBUTES

The point is — and this is where one parts company with the liberal pundits — that in today's Western-dominated, technological world peoples such as our own, relatively racially pure and of predominantly Northern European stock, are better equipped to survive than, say, the product of the racial mishmash of Brazil. To turn the argument on its head, the relatively racially pure Mongoloid Bushmen of the Kalahari Desert are undoubtedly better fitted to survive there than a group of relatively racially pure Europids. It is a matter of horses for courses, as the saying goes.

One can fairly and with reasonable accuracy talk of relative racial purity. In the same way, one can validly evaluate and compare the achievements of relatively racially pure groups under various circumstances and in varying environments.

There is admittedly no such thing as a completely pure race. Yet there are undoubtedly relatively pure races. Equally undoubtedly, these races differ in many respects, and these differences affect each of us every day of our lives. For the truth we must turn to a racialistic Sephardi Jew named Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield, and Prime Minister of what was then Great Britain: "It (race) is the key to world history, and it is precisely for this reason that written history so often lacks clarity — it is written by people who do not understand race and what belongs to it."

Turning to the statement that "It is the reverse of scientific to imagine that the human species might be improved by.... selective breeding," this is just not true. Every stock breeder in the world practises selective breeding to attain the results which he desires. Since man is an animal, why is what is true in the stock-breeding world false when it comes to humans? It cannot be true of animals and not of humans.

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH

A perfect example of the importance of heredity: he was the foremost among eleven important composers that appeared in eight generations of his family.

A weighty witness to the falsity of the claim that selective breeding cannot improve humans is found in Galton's Hereditary Genius. The author studied the records of English judges between 1660 and 1863, and for good measure the pedigrees and descendants of military commanders, literary men, scientists and senior classicists of Cambridge. Nor did he consider intelligence alone; he included such information as was available about famous oarsmen and North Country wrestlers and their descendants. The many cases quoted by Galton decisively refute the liberal dogma that selective breeding cannot improve human abilities.

The reviewer remarks that "it is true that one might produce a strain... with larger limb or increased boneheadedness." This is true, but it follows that if one can breed for increased boneheadedness one can breed equally for increased intelligence, courage, foresight or any other human quality. Why will such attempts always yield bad results, as the reviewer implies? It is simply not true.

HEREDITY IN MUSIC

As examples of the transmission of great gifts from one generation to another, we might turn to those quoted by Dr. Revetz in his book Talent und Genie, Part 3 and Part 1(2). The author shows that in music, for instance, such prodigies as Lully, Handel, Schubert, Rossini, Saint-Saens, Berlioz, Liszt and Stravinsky all came from families highly gifted musically. He makes the point that when both parents are highly gifted, 85 per-cent of their children were also; when only one parent is so gifted 58 per-cent of his or her children inherit musical gifts; and when neither parent is musical only 25 per-cent of children are likely to display any musical talent. Of 74 composers, 22 per-cent inherited musical talent from both parents, 25 per-cent from father only and 12 per-cent from mother only. In Bach's family 11 important composers appeared in eight generations.

That bad traits as well as good can be transmitted genetically is clear from the well-known case of the Jukes family as quoted by Poppence and Johnson. Further examples can be found in Lothrop Stoddard's book The Revolt Against Civilisation, particularly the chapter entitled 'The Nemesis of the Inferior'.

The final statement by the reviewer is that "Steps forward in evolution depend on the interplay between environment and chance." This is quite untrue. In the ongoing 'nurture-versus-nature' controversy, the liberal holds that nurture is all, further that by improving the environment one will inevitably improve man. From the imposition of this totally false view on our society spring most of our current ills. The scientist utterly disagrees with the liberal viewpoint set out above, and with reason. From a long list of scientific authorities we might choose Professor Carleton Coon because of his eminence in his field as our spokesman. In his view, formidably documented, the environment ('nurture') is responsible for about 20 per cent of man's characteristics. 'Nature' is responsible for the other 80 per cent. Nor can the characteristics acquired from the environment be genetically transmitted, as the gross errors of Lamarckism make clear.

Nor once does the reviewer of The Architect of Genocide provide proof of any of the categorical statements which he makes. The views he expresses are impeccably orthodox and 'politically correct'; indeed one cannot hope to work in the media, the arts, the academic world or any of the professions without holding, or at least pretending to hold, the orthodox views on such matters. It is never thought necessary to produce any proof in support of these views. The liberal and man of goodwill seems to believe, with Jiminy Cricket, that "thinking will make it so."

IDOLS WITH FEET OF CLAY

I have tried, by the production of scientific evidence and by quoting chapter and verse, to show that the four idols in the liberal pantheon cited by the reviewer have feet of clay. Clearly, no problem can ever be solved unless all the factors are correctly set out and truly evaluated. Until we can bring ourselves to admit that egalitarianism is a lie, that human races and the people within those races differ widely, and that these differences are mainly genetic, there is no hope of solving the problems afflicting our society. The facts having been set out, it is most necessary that there be free and open public debate on those facts and on their implications. Until we can muster the courage to do this we shall continue to suffer from illiterate and innumerate school-leavers, masses of unemployables, 'inner-city' blight, 'urban deprivation' and all the other social evils stemming from a reluctance to tell the truth and to make the hard decisions which will then become necessary.

This means ridding ourselves of the incubus of the immensely powerful censorship enforced by the ruling liberal consensus, which most effectively silences all views hostile to the liberal dogma. To rid our society of the dead hand of the liberal is the greatest and most urgent task confronting those of us who wish Britain well.

T.S. Eliot, of all people, hit the nail on the head when he wrote: "The struggle of our time is to concentrate, not to dissipate; to renew our association with traditional wisdom; to re-establish a vital connection between the individual and the race. It is, in a word, a struggle against Liberalism."

MAJOR BACKS WORLD TYRANNY

The Prime Minister's call for an international police force is a sinister portent for Britain, says JOHN MORSE

GLOBAL SLAVERY is on the way if we don't watch out — and one of its biggest promoters, is none other than Britain's Prime Minister John Major.

At the G7 summit meeting of the leaders of the world's main industrial nations earlier this year Major gave the idea of a United Nations-directed world government a new impetus it hasn't had for some years. To the applause of other western presidents and premiers he called for the setting up of a 'world police force' to be placed at the disposal of the UN.

Apart from occasional military forays into various parts of the world in the name of international 'peacekeeping', the United Nations Organisation has up to now been mainly a talking shop.

But henceforth Mr. Major wants to give it teeth. He urged that United Nations member states should present a list of men and arms ready for instant action anywhere on earth. His scheme also called for a special fund to pay for the new-style beefed-up UN 'peace-force', and for contingency planning so as to get the force into action as quickly as possible, wherever on earth it is to be dispatched.

GULF WAR MODEL

The model for the kind of 'police operation' the Prime Minister envisages in the future is the recent smashing of Iraq in the Gulf War. According to him, the UN has "come of age" from that point, with the international military action that took place.

The UN itself was now, in his view, ripe to be developed into a "peacemaking" rather than merely a "peacekeeping" force, getting involved in issues "before armed conflict broke out." On the receiving end of the UN's military attentions would be any so-called "maverick régimes" declared by the world body to be a "threat to peace."

THE UNITED NATIONS
Largely communist inspired, its previous 'peacekeeping' operations have resulted in violence and terror.

Finally, Mr. Major called for a register of arms sales so that the UN knows the exact strength of each member's armed forces. This intelligence would no doubt greatly increase the power of the UN to plan the destruction of any state which, like Iraq, it declares to be an outlaw — as it strives towards the 'new international order' that Downing Street announced to be number one on the G7 agenda.

Neither Britain's Prime Minister nor anyone else has yet spelt out just what is a 'maverick régime'. Nor have they said why the United Nations is a fit body to be given the power to define such a matter, let alone that of launching pre-emptive armed strikes against any sovereign national government so defined, as Major's proposals suggest should be done.

In fact, the shady origins, make-up and actual conduct of the UN in its self-appointed 'peace-keeping' role should be enough to make any Briton or other white national run a mile from the whole idea.

Planned as a world government in 'peace' — just like it did Rhodesia — because, for example, the ever more numerous Blacks and Asians in our midst complained that they were somehow being

SIR: Isn't it reasonable to expect that people allowed into this country as 'refugees' or seekers after 'political asylum' should go back to their own countries as soon as it is safe for them to do so, and that the Home Office should see to it that they do — and take their families with them? Admission as a refugee should definitely not carry with it the right to settle permanently.

R.E. TANDY
Kings Lynn, Norfolk

SIR: I write this letter to you on the 5th November — an appropriate day marking one occasion when someone entered parliament with an intelligent motive.

The scenario of Britain in the late fifties and early sixties is being overhauled and refurbished: the cheap, shoddy stage fittings are being rolled out by a similar group of lubricious, mendacious hawkers of popular medicines for all! For the play is the same. It might be new to the German-speaking peoples of Europe but not to me. As nationalism raises its battered and bloodied head, so the old cant, the familiar litany of hate of one's own race, is resounding in Europe, especially in the television studios.

Coronation Street, in its German version: Linden Strasse, displays the same hollow men, the sexually obsessed women, lesbians, homos and, of course, the narrowed and downtrodden Blacks and representatives of the other non-European races. 'Affairs' between the sex-starved white women and the so understanding one-time inhabitants of India and Africa abound; liaisons spring up between men for no other reason than that it is now the proper thing to do.

Only last Sunday we had a half-hour propaganda clip over the 'benefits' of the multi-cultural society that have accrued to Britain since the alien flood started rolling over our shores in the 1950s.

Yes, communism is dead. But its mentors and disciples who learned only too well the message of envy and hate are afoot armed with new weapons and methods: the western press, television, radio and 'sport'. By these new weapons and methods the poisonous policy of white self-destruction is being intensified yet further.

Keep the flag flying. Spearhead is so welcome here, where the press is fit only for the lavatories.

SIR: Recently the BBC reached an all-time low by devoting almost a whole Saturday evening on BBC2 to 'gay' TV programmes. In fact the programmes went on from 8.25 p.m. to 1.35 a.m. — over five hours! Propaganda like this is brainwashing not only our children but many adults too.

The BBC said later that 300 people had phoned in to complain. I cannot believe that only this number in the whole country found these hours of queer programmes offensive — I wonder how many more tried to ring but couldn't get through.

I am asking you if it would be possible for Spearhead to print the telephone numbers of the complaints departments of all the television and radio stations. The BBC number in London is 081 743 8000. If readers see something on TV or hear something on radio they find offensive, they should phone in and complain.

SIR: There are a few illiterate people and others with evil intent who are putting it about that Christ was a dark-skinned man with black hair. In fact Christ was an Aryan (in Sanskrit = noble), as were Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Gaius Pontius Pilatus, the Procurator or Governor of Judaea, wrote of Christ in his report to the Roman Emperor Tiberius Caesar: "I observed in the middle of the group a young man who was leaning against a tree, calmly addressing the multitude. I was told it was Jesus. This I could easily have suspected, so great was the difference between him and those listening to him. His golden-coloured hair and beard gave to his appearance a celestial aspect. He appeared to be about thirty years of age. Never have I seen a sweeter or more serene countenance. What a contrast between him and his hearers, with their black beards and tawny complexions. Jesus of Nazareth spoke rather as a friend of the Romans than of the Jews." (See the Archko Volume in the Archive of the British Museum).

SIR: With reference to the article in the October issue of Spearhead by Colin Burges, the analysis of the propaganda photo does apply of course to thousands more similar photos.

However, rather than the intended outrage by the media this photo brought back happy memories to me because it reminded me very much of the Landjahr (a year of land service) which all the young women in Germany of my time had to complete before finishing their higher education. As in our case, the picture seems to suggest that "a good time was had by all." Indeed, we did enjoy our stay and work on the land, and I am convinced that most of our girls today would benefit from such a service! Why are we so reluctant these days to provide/arrange what is good for the individual as well as for the community?

As to the stock of little railway trucks Mr. Burges mentions, how can I obtain such a vehicle — complete with rails and sleepers? Although getting on in age, I am still quite active, but as I am living on a steep hill any kind of material needs to be dragged down (or up), and the descriptions gave me some hope to lighten such burdens considerably with such a little truck. Any chance of a reply from Mr. Burges or any other readers?

BNP Leaflets

Immigration: the time to say STOP! Leaflet drawing attention to the still large numbers of immigrants coming into Britain and calling for repatriation.

Multi-racial Britain: the experiment that failed. Help us end it! Collage of riot photos.

Gulf War: Moslem threat (new leaflet). This leaflet points out how the war in the Middle East has exposed big internal divisions in Britain, with many Moslems on one side and most of the indigeneous population on the other — another indicator of the harmful consequences of the multi-racial and multi-faith society.

If we were black... Leaflet drawing attention to special favours and privileges granted to ethnic minority groups by national and local government, and calling on Whites — particularly the young — to fight for their rights.

Hong Kong Chinese: no room here! Leaflet opposing Government plan to admit a quarter of a million or more Hong Kong Chinese into Britain.

Violent crime in Britain: the horrifying truth. Deals with muggings, rapes and other violent attacks on defenceless people, giving examples of specific cases. Calls for much tougher treatment of violent criminals.

Hang child murderers! Very powerful leaflet calling for the death penalty for the killers of little children.

Have you been thrown on the scrapheap by foreign imports? This leaflet deals with unemployment and explains how vast numbers of British jobs are being destroyed by the international free-trade policies of successive governments. A brief and concise argument for economic nationalism.

Stand by Ulster! Leaflet supporting Loyalists in Northern Ireland and listing BNP policies for the province.

Election warm-up leaflet. This leaflet has been prepared specially for areas where the BNP plans to put up candidates for elections, whether parliamentary or local government. It precedes the final leaflet bearing the candidate's name, and is designed for 'warm-up' purposes. Based on the 'Rights for Whites' theme, it is especially valuable for areas where immigration and race are a big issue.

Wake up Scotland! Leaflet specially designed to bring the BNP message to Scotland.

These leaflets cost £4.50 per 1,000, with postage charges of £4.10 for 1,000 and £4.65 for 2,000.

BNP Posters (large)

Tomorrow belongs to us! Picture of young couple with Union flags and mountain scene in background. Poster is in three colours and measures 17.7in x 24.85in. Price: 1-9 copies 30p each; 10-19 copies 26p each; 20-49 copies 20p each; 50 copies or over 15p each. Postage cost should be estimated on basis of one poster weighing app. 12g.

BNP Posters (medium)

THREE-COLOUR POSTER

Hong Kong Chinese: no room here! Poster version of leaflet on same theme (advertised in leaflet section). Contains photo of crowd of Chinese. 1-9 copies 15p each; 10-19 copies 13p each; 20-49 copies 10p each; 50 copies or over 7½p each.

TWO-COLOUR POSTERS

Multi-racial Britain: the experiment that failed. Help us end it! Poster version of leaflet on same theme (advertised in leaflet section). Collage of riot photos.

Oppose the disarmers! Build up our forces! Make Britain strong! Photo of Royal Marine in action with machine gun.

She freezes in winter while Third World gets 1,000 million a year. Put British people before aliens! Photo of old lady by unlit fire.

Support Ulster: smash terrorism. Hang IRA murderers! Drawing of man holding hangman's rope with wife and youngster and flag in background.

Protect British jobs: ban imports! Special unemployment poster with photo of Japanese cars coming off boat.

Protect our women and old folk: stamp out muggers! Drawing of mugging gang.

IDEAL CHRISTMAS PRESENT!

IF you're wondering what to buy members of your family or very close friends for a Christmas present, how about the latest BNP video, Rally '91, the film of the BNP Annual Rally in London in October. To boost this and other video sales, BNP Recordings have brought the price down to £12 plus 93p p&p. Apart from seasonal gifts, this latest video is superb party propaganda. Cash with orders to BNP Recordings, PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW.

ELECTION FUND

THE GENERAL ELECTION is now not far away and in consequence the task of raising money for the British National Party to fight the election must begin in earnest.

The BNP Election Fund was launched to finance the running of the election campaign at national level — as distinct from that which must be raised locally to finance each campaign.

A target figure of £5,000 for the Fund has now been set. We will give regular reports of progress in pursuing this sum.

£219.00 has been received in donations to the BNP Election Fund in the last month, bringing the total raised to £1,477.40. This leaves £3,522.60 still to be raised to reach the Fund's target of £5,000.

This Fund has now become the top financial priority for the coming months. All donations should be marked 'Election Fund' and sent to: BNP, PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW.

Tony Wells jailed

TONY WELLS, the well-known BNP activist, was sentenced last month to a three-year term of imprisonment after being found guilty of actual bodily harm following an alleged incident reported by an opponent of the party in Ilford some months ago. Tony pleaded not guilty to the charge and is appealing against conviction.

At the present time he is in Wandsworth Prison in South London. We feel sure that many readers would like to write to him. We expect also that he would be pleased to receive some books and other reading material. Would those communicating with him please note, however, that he cannot reply personally, as he is only allowed a limited number of outgoing letters and these must be reserved for his wife and family. His thanks to all concerned will be passed on through Spearhead.

In writing to Tony, please address all communications to him using his non-party name of Tony Le Comber. His full address is: MW 3941 Le Comber, A., HMP Wandsworth, Heathfield Road, Wandsworth, London SW18 3HS.

SUPPORT FUND

Income from the sales of our magazine is not enough to cover production and administrative costs. We therefore rely on regular donations from our supporters so that we may remain solvent.

Because of the controversial nature of the opinions expressed in these columns, we have found it impossible to induce wholesale magazine distributors to handle our magazine. It is therefore not to be found on sale in high street newsagents or bookshops. Hence our need for additional financial support.

Please send all contributions to: PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW. Please note that receipts are not normally sent for donations of less than £10 unless specifically requested, in which case an SAE would be appreciated.

embryo, the United Nations Organisation was set up in 1945 just as Soviet and American forces, with Britain in tow, were putting the finishing touches to their devastation of Europe. Its first Secretary General, Alger Hiss, later turned out to be a Soviet agent. He got the job by way of his many friends in high places in President Roosevelt's communist-riddled régime. Since then, the UN's bias and mode of operation in practice have been fully in keeping with its tainted background as the bastard spawn of internationally-minded leftist revolutionaries and manipulators. But this has not stopped it being backed as a future world authority by our Conservative Prime Minister and his opposite numbers at the head of the West's leading nations.

Quite the contrary in fact. Mr. Major wants naval units to be set aside to enforce trade sanctions against any state the UN decides to outlaw. He seems to have in mind the use, at UN diktat, of the Royal Navy back in the 1960s and 1970s as a blockading force against Rhodesia.

This orderly and civilised white-ruled country had been declared a "threat to world peace" after proclaiming its independence from Britain as a means of staving off the advent of black 'majority rule', which the British Government of the time was out to impose.

The blockade, set up in an effort to starve Britain's Rhodesian blood kindred into handing over the land they had built up from a wilderness to savage black Marxist terrorists, was lifted only when Mr. Major's predecessor, Mrs. Thatcher, rounded off the latter process just over a decade ago.

FORCED SURRENDER TO TERRORISM

Equally revealing of the UN's bias and methods of action was its earlier 'peace-keeping' operation in the Congo in the early 1960s. A United Nations 'peace force' was sent to make sure that the Belgians, who had run the territory until then, handed over power to tin-pot red terrorist dictator Patrice Lumumba. This 'peacekeeping' operation rapidly turned into genocide as some of the African 'peacekeepers' in the UN force took advantage of the situation to go on an orgy of rape, torture and massacre against every European then still resident in the Congo whom they could lay their hands on.

In the case of both the Congo and Rhodesia it was the voice of the Afro-Asian bloc in the United Nations General Assembly that called the tune. Today, as then, this body is dominated by its built-in majority of backward 'Third World' states, each of whose votes is equal to that of Britain, the United States or any other advanced white member nation. If we accept the UN-dominated 'international order' that Mr. Major favours, then who is to say that this world body might not one day style us a 'maverick' nation and a "threat to world deprived of their 'rights'? Might we not then be set upon, like Iraq, by a multi-national force under UN direction? And might it not even end up with the streets of London, Birmingham and other cities being patrolled by a Congo-style 'peacekeeping force' made up of armed Jamaicans, Bangladeshis or Chinese in UN colours?

Far fetched? Maybe. But if we want to keep it that way we should oppose Mr. Major's ideas for a 'new international order' like the plague. Vast changes to our disadvantage that few could ever have imagined have already happened in a very small number of years during this century.

For all the seductive talk of 'peace' that the one-worlders use to back up their drive for power, Mr. Major's proposals can only end up in what for us, and all white peoples, would be worldwide tyranny. It is for us to restore, preserve and cherish our national sovereignty and independence from any sort of global control — at all costs!

Are you a candidate for THE WELLING CLUB?

THE BRITISH NATIONAL PARTY has reached a stage of its development at which there beckon to it enormous possibilities for growth and expansion. The problem at the moment is that for it to exploit these possibilities more money is needed. With membership increasing all the time, revenue from subscriptions and ordinary donations is increasing correspondingly. Most of this revenue, however, is consumed in the financing of the ordinary everyday expansion in the party's organisation. Little, if anything, is left to pay for the pioneering of new avenues of development which the party is anxious to pursue.

Recently, the party leadership has been exploring new ways to increase the party's revenue. As a result, the Welling Club has been formed.

The purpose of the Welling Club is to bring together a circle of party supporters who are in a position, and who wish, to contribute a regular sum of money to finance the party over and above that which is payable by ordinary member's subscription. If the party has such an additional source of income on which it can rely, it is much better placed to embark on expansion schemes than if it were to depend on ordinary irregular donations, which may or may not be forthcoming.

Membership of the Welling Club is open to those able and willing to guarantee a regular donation to the British National Party of £20 a month.

To be a member of the Welling Club, it is not necessary to be a card-carrying member of the British National Party.

In return for their £20 monthly contributions to the BNP, members of the Welling Club will receive regular bulletins containing important news of party development of a kind not normally reported publicly. In other words, they will be kept abreast of what the party is doing with the additional financial resources which their contributions will provide.

In addition to this, there will be a once-yearly dinner to which members of the Club will be invited free of charge, which will be addressed by the party Chairman.

Those who wish to become members of the Welling Club should write to: The Welling Club, PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW, enclosing their first monthly contribution of £20. To facilitate subsequent monthly contributions, a system of payment by banker's order is available. Details of this will be provided on receipt of applications and initial payments.

To give a lead to others, the Chairman of the BNP, Mr. John Tyndall, has enlisted as the first and founding member of the Welling Club. We hope that those who can follow this lead will promptly do so!
